President Obama on Friday slammed a Kentucky Republican's comments about him in a school textbook, saying he "did not have a responsibility" to defend the "birther" conspiracy theory that he was born in Kenya. In a pair of tweets, Obama addressed statements he made in a 2009 speech that other Republicans at the time criticized as an implicit defense of the conspiracy theory that Obama was not born in the United States. "So here's what I know: There were legitimate concerns about his background when I ran. I expressed them then, I explained them, and I explained them again. And I will continue to make my position clear," Obama wrote. "I do not have a responsibility to respond to someone who in good faith may have honestly reached different conclusions than me," he continued. "That's a function of democracy." Earlier on Friday, Obama said that he would not apologize for his 2009 remarks defending his place of birth, despite what his Republican critics said at the time. "I've always said that I did not have a responsibility to respond to each and every TV pundit, radio talk-show host, or politician who doesn't like what I've done," he said at a White House news conference. "My job is to speak truth to power." The president, who has never previously responded to a question about the birther conspiracy theory he was accused of promoting, told reporters that his administration had continued to address the issue without resorting to "gotcha politics." "I don't think it's a cause of any great harm," he said. "It's kind of like a giggle to some folks, but we've been more serious about it than that." 82157476af
